More than greater than that in value. 90 per cent of the output of both Vermont and Massachusetts is sold rough, whereas most of the stone produced in Minnesota, Wisconsin and North Carolina is sold dressed. The output of North Carolina, chiefly stone for mausoleum work, heretofore classified as building stone, has been transferred to monumental stone, the class in which it more properly belongs.

The only product whose output inereased in value in 1917 was monumental stone (7.8 per cent), although the quanty produced decreased 6.6 per cent. Building stone decreased 3,462,721 cubic feet (49 per cent) in quantity in 1917 and $803,129, or 20 per cent in value. De-tailed description of this industry for 1917 was published in press bulletin 379 killed in action April 20, and Merle Kenof the United States geological survey.

This class of stone varies greatly in production from year to year, depending on the amount of river and harbor work done by the state and federal governments. In 1916 People Notice It. Drive Them Off California, Connecticut, Delaware, North Carolina and Virginia were the states showing greatest production for this purpose. In 1917 California decreased over 50 per cent, North Carolina about 30 per cent, and Virginia and Connecticut reported practically no output of rubble; Massachusetts showed a greatly increased production, and Arizona, Dela-ware, New York and Texas were important producers although operations were confined to not more than two localities in each state.

Curbing decreased 600,817 linear feet (30 per cent) in quantity and $129,317 (15 per cent) in value in 1917 as compared with 1916, following an increase of per cent in value in 1916 over 1915. Georgia, the leading state in 1916, decreased in value $110,427 (49 per cent) and ranked third in 1917, being exceeded by Massachusetts, which showed an increase of $7,194 (4 per cent), and North Carolina, which showed an increase of with $35,818 (28 per cent).
